

Kat Cammack: Why Did You Lie About Being Raised on a Cattle Ranch? And What Else Are You Lying About?

May 9, 2022

Dear Kat:

On your website and in countless news outlets, you have repeated the lie that you were raised on a cattle ranch. This is patently false. Your family did not operate a cattle ranch and you never worked on a cattle ranch for a day in your life. The voters want to know: why did you lie about your background? And what else are you lying about?

Let us start with the facts. In 1993, your mother (Virginia Mary Cammack) bought a 33-acre piece of land located at 5265 Garton Road in Castle Rock, Colorado for $192,000. This inexpensive piece of land was far too small for a cattle ranch. Even a “small” cattle ranch is typically over two hundred acres. Tax records from this property show that the land did not have any improvements on it, which means there were no barns or other facilities required to operate a cattle ranch.

Your mother, who was a single parent, had no experience with cattle ranching. She did not start a cattle ranching company or hire cattle ranchers. We contacted the local Colorado chapters of the Cattleman Beef Association and the Future Farmers of America and neither group ever heard of your family or your ranch. In short, your mother’s land was not a cattle ranch and you have repeatedly lied about being raised on a cattle ranch.

Lying is morally and ethically equivalent to theft. When you lie to your constituents, you are literally stealing the truth from them and replacing it with a falsehood. It is far worse than being held up at gunpoint. When a person holding a gun robs you, at least they know a theft has just occurred. But when your constituents trust you to tell the truth – and you tell lies instead – you are taking advantage of their trust and leaving your constituents defenseless.

When I worked on Wall Street, I exposed fifty-two companies who were committing fraud on their shareholders. If you know my work, you know I break things down to get at the facts, factors, and circumstances that matter to the learn the truth. Now I am coming for you. Your lies are not safe, and I will expose them so the voters can see who you really are.

Your constituents want to know: Why did you lie about being raised on a cattle ranch? And what else are you lying about?

Sincerely,

Manuel P. Asensio
