

Kat Cammack: Why Did You Lie About Being Raised on a Cattle Ranch? And What Else Are You Lying About?

May 9, 2022

Dear Kat:

On your website and in countless news outlets, you have repeated the lie that you were raised on a cattle ranch. This is patently false. Your family did not own a cattle ranch. For all we know, you never worked on a cattle ranch for a single day. The voters want to know: why did you lie about your background? And what else are you lying about?

Let us start with the facts. In 1993, your mother (Virginia Mary Cammack) bought a 33-acre piece of land located at 5265 Garton Road in Castle Rock, Colorado for $192,000. Tax records from this property show that the land did not have any improvements on it, which means there were no barns or other facilities needed to run a cattle ranch. This inexpensive piece of land was far too small for a cattle ranch. Even a “small” cattle ranch is typically over two hundred acres.

Your mother, who was a single parent, had no experience with cattle ranching. She did not start a cattle ranching company or hire cattle ranchers. We contacted the local Colorado chapters of the Cattleman Beef Association and the Future Farmers of America and neither group ever heard of your family or your ranch. In short, your mother’s land was not a cattle ranch and you have repeatedly lied about being raised on a cattle ranch.

Lying is morally and ethically equivalent to theft. When you lie to your constituents, you are stealing the truth from them and replacing it with a falsehood. When a person holding a gun robs you, at least they know a theft has just occurred. But when your constituents trust you to tell the truth – and you tell lies instead – you are taking advantage of their trust and leaving your constituents defenseless.

When I worked on Wall Street, I exposed fifty-two companies who were committing fraud on their shareholders. If you know my work, you know I break things down to get at the facts, factors, and circumstances that matter to the learn the truth. This is what I have done with you now. You have had since last November to respond.

Your lies are not safe, and I will expose them one by one so the voters can see who you really are politically and as a person.

Your constituents want to know: Why did you lie about being raised on a cattle ranch? And what else are you lying about?

Sincerely,

Manuel P. Asensio
